

A Bolt Of Lightning From The Blue

The vast commentary on Vajrakila that clearly defines the essential points

annotated translations
by Martin J. Boord

including Phur 'grel 'bum nag as transmitted to
Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal

WANDEL VERLAG berlin 2010

Khordong Commentary Series I

The line drawings included in this book are taken with friendly permission of Robert Beer from his book “The Encyclopedia of Tibetan Symbols and Motifs” published by Serindia Publications, London.

This book has been realised with the help of many sponsors around the world. Grateful acknowledgement is due to their financial support of this project.

ISBN 978-3-942380-00-3

© 2002 Martin Boord

Published by WANDEL VERLAG berlin 2010

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without prior written permission of the publisher.

First Edition 1000, 2002 by Khordong e.V.

Second Edition, 260, 2007 by Khordong e.V.

Third Edition, 250, 2010 by Wandel Verlag, Berlin edition khordong is the publication series of the non-profit Khordong e.V. in Germany, published by WANDEL VERLAG berlin.

Please visit our websites: www.khordong.net & www.wandel-verlag.de

Contact: edition@khordong.net & mail@wandel-verlag.de

Typesetting and design by Andreas Ruft, Berlin

Cover design by Lisi Poller-Frischengruber, Vienna

Printed at EU on 100% chlorophine & acid free paper

WANDEL VERLAG berlin 2010

Contents

Translator's preface

Dramatis personae	xiii
Indian origins	xvii
Arrangement of the Hundred Thousand Words	xxii
Subsequent spread of the doctrines	xxvii
Doctrinal themes in the 'Bum nag	xxix
India and Tibet	xxxvii
Sources & Acknowledgements	xxxxi

EPISODE I

Sanskrit sources for the study of kilanaividhi

Kauṭilya, Arthaśāstra	3
Sudhanakumārāvadāna	3
Kuladatta, Kriyāsamgrahapañjikā	5
Mañjuśrīmūlakalpa	18
Ḍāmara-tantra	19
Siddhaikavira-mahātantra	20
Caṇḍamahāroṣaṇa-tantra	21
Mahāsukhavajrapāda, Padmini	24
Herukābhidāna-tantra	25
Saṁvarodaya-tantra	25
Sarvatathāgatātattvasaṁgraha	26
Guhyasamāja-tantra	26
Candrakīrti, Pradīpoddyotana	28
Nāgārjuna, Pañcakrama	46
Muniśribhadra, Yogīmanoharā	49
Vajrapāṇi (commenting on Herukābhidāna-tantra)	54
Śubhākaragupta, Abhisamayamañjari	55
Kumārakalahaṁsa, Saṁvararahasyasādhana	57
Paramarahasya-tantra	58
Ānandagarbha, Sarvavajrodāya	59
Laghukālacakra-tantra	61
Śrī Puṇḍarīka, Vimalaprabhā	62
Dharmākaraśānti, Kālacakrabhagavatsādhanaividhi (Laghukālacakra-tantra)	63 67
(Śrī Puṇḍarīka, Vimalaprabhā)	67
Padmaśrimitra, Maṇḍalopāyikā	70
Durjayacandra, Mitapadā	70
Abhayākaragupta, Vajrāvali	71

EPISODE II

rDo rje phur pa rtsa ba'i rgyud kyi dum bu, Fragment of the Root Tantra 79

EPISODE III

dPal rdo rje phur pa spu gri nag po'i rgyud, The Black Razor Tantra 93

EPISODE IV

Translated text of the Phur 'grel 'bum nag

vi

INTRODUCTION

General overview of the Vajrakila doctrines

contents

- | | |
|---|-----|
| (1) The way of summarizing tantra into two | 110 |
| (a) root tantra | 110 |
| (b) explanatory tantra | 110 |
| (2) The three methods of tantric exegesis | 110 |
| (a) explanation of the Kila doctrines in accordance with mahāyoga tantra | 110 |
| (b) explanation of the Kila doctrines in accordance with anuyoga āgama | 110 |
| (c) explanation of the Kila doctrines in accordance with atiyoga upadeśa | 111 |
| (3) The six hidden precepts (six bindings) of tantra | 111 |
| (4) The ten steps of tantric engagement | 111 |
| (5) The twelvefold list of the essential points of tantra | 111 |
| (6) The twenty-one tantra possessing the key to the life force | 112 |
| (7) The fifty-one fundamental Kila deities | 112 |
| (8) The two thousand six hundred and one auxillary gods | 112 |

Special presentation of the practice lineage

- | | |
|---|-----|
| (1) The nidāna that introduces the guru | 113 |
| (a) his lineage of birth | 113 |
| (i) womb birth and miraculous emanation | 113 |
| (ii) worldly and supramundane families | 113 |
| (iii) four kinds of greatness | 113 |
| (iv) four degrees of vidyādhara | 113 |
| (v) eight secret code names | 113 |

(b) his deeds and activities	118
(i) attainment of worldly power and siddhi	119
(ii) subjugation of dangerous beings of the eight classes	120
(iii) consecration of bSam-yas vihāra	123
(c) the transmission of his tradition	124
(i) siddha lineage	124
(ii) lineage of ordinary folk	128
(2) The nidāna that introduces the teacher	129
(a) the special object to be tamed	129
(b) the special being who tamed him	131
(c) the special method of taming	132
(3) The nidāna that introduces the tantra	135
(a) the time when the vajra vehicle of secret mantra arose	135
(i) the circumstances in which the tantra were taught	135
(ii) the period during which they appeared in the human realm	135
(b) classification of the Dharma within nine yāna	138	vii
(i) the explanation that accords with the trikāya	138
(ii) explaining the series of nine yāna	138
(c) classification of the tantra of Vajrakīla	141
(i) from the standpoint of relative truth	141
(ii) from the standpoint of absolute truth	141

DETAILED ANALYSIS OF THE VAJRAKĪLA DOCTRINES

The six bindings (chings) or hidden precepts (khog don) of tantra

PART ONE the higher rites:

Attainment of unsurpassed awakening

(1) To hold to the foundation of actions, attaining success by means of the five excellences	143
(a) the excellent person	143
(b) the excellent place	144
(c) the excellent retinue	146
(d) the excellent time	146
(e) the excellent engagement	148
(i) provisions of food for sustenance	148
(ii) provisions of antidotes to avert misfortune	148
(iii) provisions for the divine attainments	149
(iv) provisions for the fulfilment of vows	151
(v) provisions for the destruction of enemies and obstructors	151

(2) Establishing the essential layout of the triple maṇḍala , together with the preparatory methods of its prior approach	154
(a) seven stages of the approach (sngon 'gro , preliminary practices)	154
(i) establishing the boundaries (simābandha)	154
(ii) opening the symbolic door	156
(iii) paying homage to the symbols	156
(iv) adopting the sect-marks (rtags gdab pa)	156
(v) confession of sins	157
(vi) the descent of blessings	158
(vii) sanctifying the three articles	158
(b) three stages of generating the reality of the triple maṇḍala	163
(i) generating the triple samādhi of the basis	163
the samādhi of thusness	164
the all-illuminating samādhi	167
the samādhi of cause	169
(ii) generating the maṇḍala palace of residence	171
(iii) generating the deities who reside there	177
the fundamental dharmakāya maṇḍala of the primordial state	177
the sambhogakāya maṇḍala of wrathful kings	185
the nirmāṇakāya maṇḍala of material kila	194
(3) With regard to the empowerment of long life by the triple world, one empowers the life force of the wisdom gods by means of the life force	203
(4) Invoking the wisdom deities of the maṇḍala , one takes the essence of siddhi through offerings and ritual service	205
(a) invitation of the wisdom deities	205
(i) prayers of supplication	205
(ii) the actual invitation	205
(b) presenting them with eight kinds of offerings	206
(i) offerings made with the hands to the maṇḍala in the sky	206
(ii) the absorption [of the wisdom beings] and offerings of embrace made by four goddesses	206
(iii) offering the bali cake (gtor ma)	209
(iv) offering the nectar medicine (bdud rtsi sman)	211
(v) offering the blood of the three terminations (tshar gsum)	212
(vi) offering union and slaughter (sbyor sgrol)	214
(vii) praying for what we want	216
(viii) offerings to the assembly and hymns of praise	218
(c) performing the ritual service (sevā)	220
(d) taking siddhi at the time of the offerings	221

PART TWO the lower rites:
Annihilation of enemies and obstructors

(5) Endowed with the transmitted precepts (āgama) of cleansing abluion, the transmitted precepts of longevity and the six techniques of hidden mantra , one performs the rite of implantation	223
(a) the six techniques of hidden mantra	223
(b) the transmitted precepts of cleansing abluion and of longevity	228
(c) the genuine rite of implantation	231
(6) The final three activities of pressing down, burning and hurling	234
(a) pressing down	234
(b) burning	240
pacification homa	240
enriching homa	240
overpowering homa	240
fierce homa	240
(c) hurling	244

ix

PART THREE
Further analysis

The ten steps of tantric engagement

(1) The general points are covered by three kinds of nidāna or introduction	251
(2) The meaning is made clear by the threefold definition (lakṣaṇatā)	251
(a) defining the maṇḍala	251
(b) defining the mantra	254
(c) defining the materials required in the rite	257
(3) Kīla of four materials that penetrate the four extremes	259
(a) the kīla of wisdom awareness	259
(b) the kīla of emanated compassion	260
(c) the kīla of secret bodhicitta	261
(d) the material kīla with signs	263
(4) Straightening out the rules of the activities by three great traditions of practice	266
(5) The wisdom deities are caused to enter the vital point by means of the all-encompassing mantra	267
(6) The ḍākinī are really incited by means of malign spells of 18 assembled syllables in three groups of six	268
(7) The vital essence of the three visualizations is expressed in accordance with the three meanings of 'life force'	269
(8) Black deeds are performed by means of 18 great traditions of liberation	270
(9) Ritual activity is supplemented by eight masteries	271
(10) All rites are discharged by the three extreme subjugations	272

contents

The twelvefold list of the essential points of tantra

	(1) If one does not know the six far-reaching lines of liturgical verse, the higher activities cannot be distinguished from the lower	273
	(2) If one does not know the six techniques of hidden mantra , the fierce mantra nail cannot wound the enemy	273
	(3) If one does not know the six hidden connections, the concealed secrets cannot be understood	274
	(4) If one does not know the scissors which are the life force of the oral instructions, the life force of the enemies and obstructors will not be severed	275
	(5) If one does not know the rite of the great billowing wings, the soul of the enemies and obstructors will not be drawn forth	276
x	(6) If one does not know the ritual of the secret kila which is a lion's roar of argumentation, the yogin has no method of liberation from internal dispute	277
	(7) If one does not know the method of determining the central point, engaging in activities will only rebound	279
contents	(8) If one does not know the method of turning the wheel, one's activities will not be accomplished	279
	(9) If one does not know the method of equipping the effigy, the focal point of the visualizations will be worthless	280
	(10) If one does not know the true nature of the fundamental ground, the implantation will be meaningless	280
	(11) If one does not know the deeper intention of the precepts of longevity and the ablution water, there will be mere malign mantra	280
	(12) If one does not know the rites of elevating to a higher plane, one will be merely a butcher	281

The four kila

	(1) The sky-like practitioner nails the kila of wisdom awareness into the ground of the dharmadhātu	282
	(2) The mountain-like practitioner nails the kila of the rope of embracing compassion into the ground of all sentient beings in the triple world	284
	(3) The practitioner who is like a kalantaka bird nails the kila of secret bodhicitta into the mother's sky	286
	(4) The practitioner who is like the trunk of a sandalwood tree nails the material kila into the enemies and obstructors	289

Three groups of malign mantra

The outer system of the DHADDHI mantra	294
The inner system of the assembly (' dus pa)	295
The secret system of combination (bsdu yig)	297
Implantation of the kila in accordance with the traditions of slaughter	299

Tantra, āgama and upadeśa

Root texts, transmitted precepts and oral instructions

The arousal of bodhicitta	301
An explanation of the empowerments
(a) the instructions	303
(b) the practice
the vase empowerment	305
the secret empowerment	307
the wisdom knowledge empowerment	308
the fourth empowerment	309
The method of deity generation and its seals (outer utpattikrama)	310
samādhi of creative meditation
the yoga of the generation stage, which is skilful method	311
the yoga of the completion stage, which is wisdom	311
the yoga of both together, which is non-dual	312
Accepting the accomplishments (siddhi) generating accomplishments by means of sādhana	313
absorbing the accomplishments	315
developing the accomplishments
(inner utpattikrama)	318
(secret utpattikrama)	320
The view of infallible perception	321
The code of conduct that reaches the ultimate goal	322
Sacred oaths that are not to be transgressed	324
The rite of implantation	326
The seven-day observance for the dead	328
The rite of cremation ('inner homa rite')	332
Preparation of votary or reliquary sāccha	336
Installation of the deity	336
Regulations of the ritual service
ordinary recitation	339
special recitation	342
three deeds of refreshing sustenance	343

EPISODE V

Verses of aspiration for success in the practice of Vajrakīla

347

APPENDIX

Bibliography

353

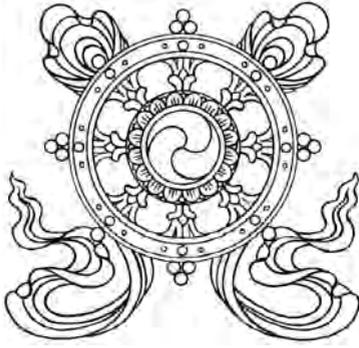

Index

359

xii

contents

PREFACE

Dramatis personae

The main text presented in this volume is the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, The Black One Hundred Thousand [words] Commentary on the Kila. The title 'Black One Hundred Thousand' indicates a complete cycle of teachings ('bum), vast in its scope, that is clearly defined and precise (nag po) in its methodological application. This 'unambiguous and clear set of teachings from which nothing has been omitted' has at its heart the deliberations of three ācārya, Padmasambhava, Vimalamitra, and the Nepali Śilamañju, who extensively revised and commented upon all that they had heard of kila lore whilst cloistered away together in a religious retreat at Yang-le-shod (present-day Pharping, Nepal).

This work is of seminal importance for it clearly witnesses the very origin of the cult of Vajrakila. It was precisely during this retreat that the many strands of kila lore were finally woven together into a coherent masterpiece of tantric Buddhism and thus it helps to illuminate the process by which tantric methods were being related to soteriology at this time. Beautifully codified in terms of both theory and practice, this divine scheme of meditation and magic was subsequently transmitted to Tibet and became established there as one of the major modes of religious engagement. So much so, in fact, that many previous writers on Tibet have actually assumed the kila cult to be of Tibetan origin.

According to traditional accounts, the doctrines of Vajrakila were first taught among the gods and nāga before being transmitted to the human realm. They were subsequently propagated in India by Indrabhūti, Dhanasaṃskṛta, Śrisimha, Prabhastī and an unnamed kāpālīka brahmin. Kila chronicles, such as the *Concise History*¹ written by gTsang mkhan-chen and the gNam lcags spu gri lo rgyus chos 'byung by bDud-'joms rinpoche, say that these Vajrakila doctrines were taught by Indrabhūti to Dhanasaṃskṛta who then passed them on to Padmasambhava, Vimalamitra and Śilamañju. These three companions additionally received teachings from Prabhahasti. Furthermore, the doctrines of Vajrakila are said to have been taught in Khotan by Vairocana, who studied in India under Śrisimha.

1 The Phur pa'i chos 'byung bsdus pa is to be found in gTsang mkhan-chen, rDo rje phur pa'i chos 'byung pp.161-196. Published by Taklung Tsetrul, Darjeeling, 1979.

Unfortunately, no pertinent Indic text survives from this period and we know only very little of the masters who were responsible for the transmission of the kila doctrines during that far-off epoch. The essentially hagiographical accounts that are available tell us that the teacher Prabhahasti was born in Zahor, in western India. He studied vinaya with the master Puṇyakirti and went for ordination into the bhikṣu saṅgha with Śāntiprabha who gave him the name Śākyaprabha. Becoming learned in the entire tripiṭaka, he studied the path of esoteric tantra with the masters Vajrahāsyā (who studied under dGa'-rab rdo-rje) and so on, and accomplished the final stage of great bliss. His name as a follower of guhya mantra was Prabhahasti. With regard to the mahāyogatantra, at the time of the ḍākini's revelation of the eight transmitted precepts (bka' brgyad) from the great stūpa in Śitavana,² Prabhahasti received the section on Vajrakila which he sent to Padmasambhava in Yang-le-shod as a means of subduing the obstacles to his practice. It was from Prabhahasti also that Padmasambhava received ordination. The Phur 'grel 'bum nag says that, on that occasion, Padmasambhava was given the name Śākya bshes-gnyen. Other texts say that the name was Śākyasimha. Padmasambhava is said to have received teachings on Vajrakila from Prabhahasti on eighteen separate occasions. It is also recorded that Buddhaguhya was one of Prabhahasti's students.

Concerning Padmasambhava himself, the 'Bum nag has a whole chapter devoted to his biography and it would therefore be superfluous to say anything more here.

Vimalamitra was born in Hastivana (Hastisthala), also in western India.³ It is said that he studied the entire tripiṭaka of sūtra and tantra, becoming a most erudite scholar. Then Vajrasattva appeared before him and said, "For 500 lifetimes you have been a great paṇḍita and you have studied the true Dharma, but still you have not attained its fruit. Therefore you must go to the temple of the Bodhi Tree in China." When he reached that place he encountered Śrisimha, the master of atiyoga (rdzogs chen, great perfection), from whom he received aural instructions for twenty years. Later he received the atiyoga texts from Jñānasūtra. Vimalamitra was also particularly learned in the Māyājāla cycle which he learned from Buddhaguhya and, at the time of the ḍākini's revelation of the eight transmitted precepts from the great stūpa in Śitavana, Vimalamitra received the section on Vajrāmṛta. For twenty years he resided in Kāmarūpa as the priest and guru of king Haribhadra. He also remained for seven years in the great charnel ground of Prabhāskara, where he taught hordes of untamed creatures and left a concealed legacy of Treasure Dharma (gter chos). At the invitation of Nyang Ting-nge-'dzin bzang-po, one of the ministers of Khri Srong-

2 For details, see my Cult of the Deity Vajrakila, Chapter IV.

3 Kashmir, according to Yeshe Tsoygal, The Lotus-Born, Shambhala, 1993, p.113.

Ide'u-btsan, he subsequently went to Tibet and at that time Vimalamitra was said to have been 200 years old. Teaching the highest doctrines of atiyoga, assisting with the work of translation, and concealing Treasure texts for future revelation, Vimalamitra remained in Tibet for thirteen years. We are most interested here to note his involvement in the translation of the Kilanirvāṇa-tantra, a work often quoted in the 'Bum nag, as well as the Phur pa 'phrin las phun sum tshogs pa in 15 chapters and the Phur pa bcu gnyis 'byung ba'i rgyud chung bsdan pa, all of which are to be found in the various 'Collections of Ancient Tantras' (rNying ma'i rgyud 'bum). It is believed that the rainbow body ('ja' lus) of Vimalamitra now resides upon mount Wu-tai-shan, the five-peaked abode of Mañjuśrī in China, from whence he sends emanations to Tibet once every hundred years in order to propagate the Vima snying-thig, the innermost essence of his instructions on atiyoga.⁴

Very little seems to have been recorded concerning the life of Śilamañju. Our text refers to him throughout simply as bal po, 'the Newar,' 'the Nepalese.' bDud-'joms rinpoche, in his History of the Nyingma School, follows Bu-ston in saying that Śilamañju was one of four foreign scholars invited to Tibet by Khri Srong-btsan sgam-po, in the early half of the seventh century, for whom he worked as a translator of sacred texts. This cannot be the same Śilamañju who, with a flourish of his kila one hundred years later, caused the white rock face of mount Gong-po to crumble. Only slightly more plausible is the report in the Padma bka' thang that Śilamañju was invited to Tibet by Khri Srong-lde'u-btsan.⁵ Among his other deeds at that time, he is supposed to have worked with Vasudhara (another Newar) and the native scholar Sangs-rgyas ye-shes in the translation of a tantra of Yamāntaka. There is, however, no such translation to be found either in the rNying ma'i rgyud 'bum or in the revised bKa' 'gyur. Our present text, the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, makes no mention of Śilamañju in Tibet although it does associate him very closely with Padmasambhava in both India and Nepal. Indeed, according to this source, the three scholars responsible for its compilation were ordained together by the master Buddhaghūya in the great charnel ground Śitavana, in the holy land of Magadha (southern Bihar). Also in India they practised sādhana together at rGya-mtsho'i-gling (*Sāgaradvīpa or Jalendradvīpa, location unknown) and thereafter travelled together to the master Prabhastī, from whom they received teachings on the deity Vajrakīla. At the end of his life, Śilamañju attained the rainbow body of great transference (mahāvīyutkrāntikāya), leaving no corporeal remains behind.⁶

4 For a more detailed biography of Vimalamitra see: Tulku Thondup, Masters of Meditation and Miracles, Shambhala, 1996, pp.68-73.

For details of his activities in Tibet see the Padma bka' thang LXXX, LXXXI & passim: Douglas & Bays, The Life and Liberation of Padmasambhava, pp.480 ff.

5 Douglas & Bays, The Life and Liberation of Padmasambhava, p.488.

6 NSTB p.38.

xvi

preface

Another of the historical personages mentioned in the preamble of our text is the master Buddhaguhya. Born in central India and ordained at Nālandā, Buddhaguhya is reputed to have studied the esoteric tantra under such luminary scholars as Buddhajñānapāda and Prabhahasti. Attaining siddhi, he moved to Oḍḍiyāna where he mastered the Māyājāla cycle under Lilāvajra. Buddhaguhya transmitted the precepts of the Māyājāla cycle to both Vimalamitra and Padmasambhava and, according to the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, it was Buddhaguhya who recommended that Padmasambhava be invited to Tibet to assist in the foundation of bSam-yas monastery. It is said that, on many occasions he met deities in the flesh. On a visit to Potala mountain he saw Avalokiteśvara and Tārā, who exhorted him to go to Tibet. During his lifetime in Tibet, Buddhaguhya supervised the translation of many important and authoritative treatises and transmitted the precepts of the Māyājāla cycle to a number of disciples in the region of mount Kailash. Even after his death, it is believed that he continues to emanate teaching forms in order to instruct disciples of later ages.

According to the Phur pa che mchog gi lo rgyus, the sādhana at rGya-mtsho'i-gling mentioned above was an amṛta practice under the direction of the master Dhanasaṃskṛta, and it was the obstacles encountered by the three ācārya at that time that prompted them to search out and study the Kīla doctrines.⁷ Because the three of them each had a different perception of what had been taught, they then cloistered themselves together in a private seminar in Yang-le-shod where they worked on consolidating their divergent opinions. It therefore seems clear that, before the time of the three ācārya, a substantial body of Kīla knowledge must already have been in fairly widespread circulation, and this is indeed supported by the Sanskrit literature presented in our opening chapter. The religious chronicles, however, make it clear that this accumulated wealth of knowledge incorporated inconsistencies and was therefore in need of revision. It was in response to this need, then, that the three vajra masters held their seminar in Nepal, somewhere around the middle of the eighth century AD, during which they discussed all the teachings that they had collected in India prior to this date. The present text called The Black One Hundred Thousand Word Commentary on the Kīla, greatly revered in Tibet as an unrivalled masterwork, is the report of that seminar consolidating this body of knowledge, as it has come down to us today.

Having reached a consensus, it is said, the three ācārya retired together to the Asura Cave, also in the Kathmandu valley, for a lengthy yogic retreat focussing on Kīla.

7 See my Cult of the Deity Vajrakīla, pp.111-114.

Indian origins

All over the world, wherever people practise the art of cursing one another, we find sharp pins (kila/kilaka) of one sort or another employed as magical weapons with which to spike the traces or effigy of an enemy whose presence is called to mind. There are many references to such acts of witchcraft to be found in the grimoires of medieval India, and an old rite of this sort is recommended by the non-Buddhist Kauṭilya, a minister in the court of Candragupta, in his Machiavellian treatise Arthasāstra. The notion of being the victim of pinning down is brought forward in the eighth century drama Mālatīmādhava in which a certain love-lorn woman lamenting her fate complains “Even breathing for me has become a vajrakila.” Commenting on the word vajrakila, Harihara in his ṭikā explains that anything which does not go away even when one wishes it to go away is a vajrakila.⁸ Thus it appears common knowledge that whatever is pegged down by the vajra spike is immovably fixed.

Such ideas and their concomitant magical practices for the subjugation or destruction of enemies were subsequently incorporated into the tantric texts compiled throughout the following centuries and many similar references are to be found in later sources, both Buddhist and Śaivite.

A more refined type of kila ritual is also encountered in our literature, in which the sorcerer strives to gain control over an area of ground, either by subjugating the centre or the periphery. To illustrate this theme I cite an early avadāna story in which four spikes joined together with string are used to enclose an area (in this case, a pond) in order to capture its inhabitant (a young nāga). This notion of an area of land being held firmly under control by the placement of spikes seems to have become axiomatic for Indian scholars in the eighth-ninth centuries because in an entirely non-tantric commentary on the Aṣṭasāhasrikā-prajñāpāramitā the author Haribhadra describes the site of the Buddha’s enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍa) as “a portion of land within which a set of four vajrakila are established in the intermediate directions.”⁹

This leads us on to a typical architectural rite from the Kathmandu Valley (below, p.5 ff), in which a plot of land designated to become the site of a monastery is purified and blessed (i.e. taken under control). Employing a ground plan of six by six regular square chambers (the ugrapīṭha plan), the master stands in the centre pacifying the innermost four chambers and places a wrathful protective deity in each of the remaining 32. He then presents each wrathful deity with a kila in his own likeness and commands them to hammer down any demons that may prove obstructive to the cause of the future monastery. Four of these deities fix their kila in the inner corners of the ground, but the remaining 28 deities take their kila to the edge of the site and hammer them down around the periphery. Having thus rendered the ground pure and free of any impediment, the standing spikes are later connected together by lengths of string which are to be used by the workmen as guide lines for the construction of the monastery walls and so on.

8 Text of the Mālatīmādhava by Bhavabhūti, together with ṭikā by Harihara, published in Pondichery by Institut Français, Publications du Département d’Indologie 77, 1999.

9 vidiksthītavajrakīlacatuṣṭayāntargato bhūmibhāgaḥ // Haribhadra, Abhisamayālaṅkāraloka, edited by Unrai Wogihara, Tokyo, 1932, p.206.

These two models of praxis, bringing harm to an enemy or taking control of a plot of land, are really both dedicated to a single end — the subjugation of evil, either visible (i.e. in human form) or invisible (hostile gods and demons). Thus they are both subsumed by Padmasambhava in his teachings under the rubric ‘material kila for the destruction of obstacles.’ This, he says, is the lowest level of kila practice, far surpassed by the three higher kila of wisdom, compassion and non-dual bodhicitta. This analysis of kīlanavidhi into four types taught in the ‘Bum nag is nowhere found explicitly stated in the Sanskrit texts but all four are implied in the Guhyasamāja-tantra (GST), the most comprehensive of all our Indic sources.

The kila of wisdom awareness is alluded to in the GST in a passage which states that the rite of nailing down is ‘born of the true condition’ (tattvasambhava) (GST XIV,76) This theme is taken up more pointedly by later commentators on the GST, especially by Nāgārjuna in his explication of the preliminary apotropaic rites in which he emphasizes the lack of inherent existence in all such meditation.

Compassionate aspects of the practice of slaughter (māraṇa) are also regularly emphasized in the Sanskrit sources. Being transfixed with a kila and hammered down, the host of obstacle-creating demons are established in the great bliss of the natural condition in which there is but a single taste, they say.

Certain erotic practices are also encountered here, following an old Indian paradigm of sexual yoga in which the yogin in union with his consort allows a solitary drop of bodhicitta (semen) to move to the ‘jewel’ (tip) of his vajra (penis) where it merges with a drop of female sexual fluid. His task is then to withdraw this fertilized seed back into his own body and cause it to enter the central channel (avadhūti), via which it ascends until it reaches the crown of his head. As a result of this ‘reabsorption of the aroused Akṣobhya’ the yogin achieves great bliss and liberation from all the fetters of saṃsāra. In the rites of Vajrakīla as taught in the GST, the yogin employs his kila (penis, referred to by Padmasambhava as the kila of bodhicitta) to reach the places of his victim’s body, speech and mind while that enemy lies imprisoned within the triangular pit (yoni, dharmodaya) of the yoginī consort. “As soon as he is struck” says the text, the yogin must withdraw his seed and cause it to ascend the central channel. On these occasions, however, the purpose of the yogin is not his own blissful liberation but the ‘liberation’ (i.e. slaughter) of his enemy, and this is achieved by his capture of the victim’s body, speech and mind which has become merged with the yogin’s shining drop of bodhicitta.

Both the deity Vajrakīla and a great deal of kila lore are encountered in the GST. Indeed, this text and such other Indic sources as are known today present us with a considerable amount of scattered information. The hṛdaya of the kila, which becomes the personal mantra of the deity, is encountered for the first time in the Sarvatathāgatātattvasaṅgraha (STTS), together with the myth of the subjugation of Rudra which comes to the fore in the subsequent Tibetan tradition. A retinue of ten wrathful kings (daśakrodharāja) and much esoteric understanding of kīlanavidhi is taken over from the Indian Guhyasamāja tradition and all of this is incorporated into the meditative system organized by our three ācārya which subsequently became widely known throughout Tibet. Their system, however, evidently failed to become popular in the land of its origin, for the heart mantra of the deity is acknowledged as such by only one later exegete, Kuladatta of Kathmandu. The later Abhayākara Gupta is quite dismissive of this powerful mantra which, by his time, had been accorded the highest status in Tibet. It may also be of interest to note here the transmutations undergone by this mantra throughout the course of its history. All Indian traditions address the deity with the vocative VAJRAKĪLA but this is transmitted to Tibet as VAJRAKĪLI. The original hṛdaya as found in the STTS includes the imperative BANDHAYA (you must suppress) which is shortened to BANDHA in the Kuladatta text and to the seed-syllable BĀM in most of the Tibetan sources. The VKMK uses BĀM in the hṛdaya of Vajrakila and BANDHA in the mantra of the retinue. Abhayākara Gupta omits this part of the mantra completely.

Nor does any Indian Kila source make mention of Rudra's defeat, or place Vajrakila as the lord of his own maṅḍala. There is, in fact, not a single text (either root tantra or commentary) devoted to this deity currently available in Sanskrit. Tibetan texts, on the other hand, both root tantra and commentaries, are very numerous indeed. The Indian sources speak much more of hammering down the kīla, which in later texts is often described as being in the likeness of the deity who hammers it down. The three ācārya, however, transmitted to Tibet an early image reminiscent of the churning of the ocean, for they describe the deity as semi-demonic and 'rolling a kīla the size of mount Meru between the palms of his hands.' The action of nailing down in this system is more plunging (descending like a bolt of lightning) and twisting (rolling) than the slow hammering of the Sanskrit sources. The mantra of Vajranakha (OM̐ GHA GHA GHĀTAYA etc.) that finds a prominent place in the Indian system is generally relegated in the Tibetan to only a minor role that slips beneath the lofty gaze of the Bum 'nag.¹⁰ This level of nailing down is primarily related to the earth rituals (bhūmivīdhi) of kriyātantra, performed as part of the general process of purifying and taking control of a plot of ground in the context of architecture. A wandering Tibetan yogin, also, may well invoke such rites as he hammers down the pegs of his dwelling tent at night, for in this type of process the kīla are generally arrayed around the outer periphery of the sacred space and they do not often encroach upon the centre. In India, their function on the liminal borders of the maṇḍala is to destroy the demon lords who may hinder the smooth operation of the maṇḍala, and to frighten away their minions. In the Tibetan tradition centering upon Vajrakila, on the other hand, all controlling members of the opposition are enslaved and bound under oath to serve the cause of Buddhist Dharma as 'converts' to the more powerful religion. It is only minor (i.e. personal) enemies that are slaughtered outright and transferred to places of better rebirth.

10 An early Tibetan manuscript discovered in Dunhuang, however, utilizes this Vajranakha mantra as the activity mantra for the rite of slaying. This same MS also uses the hṛdaya of Body, Speech and Mind from the GST (see below: pp.39-42) as mantra for the consecration of the kīla. See: Mayer & Cantwell, "A Dunhuang Manuscript on Vajrakīlaya."

The extant Sanskrit sources, furthermore, present us with a fluctuating pattern of kila deities, for each text assigns the task of nailing down obstructing demons (vighnakīlana) to suitable members of its own retinue. The earliest mention of the complete 51-deity Vajrakila maṇḍala as encountered in Tibet is found in a short tantra, said to be merely a fragment of the root text, that Padmasambhava himself carried there across the mountains from India. Unfortunately the original is no longer available and we must make do here with its 13th century translation into Tibetan by the Sa-skya paṇḍita. This vital document, then, is presented herein as our second chapter.

In its initial summary overview, the 'Bum nag says that the 51 deities of the basic maṇḍala are follows:

- (01-20) The ten krodha kings together with their ten wrathful wives.
- (21-40) Their twenty animal-headed emanations (piśāci).
- (41-45) The five Supreme Sons.
- (46-49) The four goddesses who guard the maṇḍala gateways.
- (50-51) The central divine yuganaddha couple.

Prior knowledge of this maṇḍala is presumed throughout the text and, thus, having shown in the first instance just how the deities are enumerated, they are mentioned by name only when some detail or other of their individual characters is being highlighted. Familiarity with this maṇḍala is required for anyone who wishes to comprehend some of the more arcane details encountered in the body of the text which is, after all, a commentary for yogins already initiated into the mysteries of the maṇḍala. As far as initiates are concerned, such details would be superfluous here because, for them, the source of information on this topic is the devotional liturgy in which the process of generation stage yoga is described in full.¹¹

The colour scheme of the maṇḍala is variously described in the different Tibetan lineages of Kila practice. As for the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, this states (translation p.189) that, at the time of the ritual service, all the deities in the east are white, the south yellow, west red, and north green. Deities in the intermediate directions combine the colours of the two adjacent cardinal directions. The zenith is the colour of the sky and the nadir is the colour of darkness. Possessed of three faces and six arms, the right and left faces of the wrathful kings are like those of the intermediate directions. Each is actively embraced by a consort who has one face and two arms. She may be blue in colour or the same colour as her lord, and it is explained that the animal-headed emanations to the right and left of these couples are the same colour as the faces to the right and left of the krodha kings.

11 For a listing of the maṇḍala deities see my Cult of the Deity Vajrakila, pp.88-89. NB. The 'red bear' (Tib. dred) listed as the devourer in the northeast in that study is replaced in the present work by hyena.

Note that the 20 animal-headed emanations that accompany these ten wrathful kings and their wives are in male/female pairs in the 'Bum nag, the males generated on the right from white bindu, and the females on the left from red bindu. In both the VKMK and the entire corpus of Northern Treasures literature, however, these emanations are all female.¹²

Of fundamental importance in the layout of the maṇḍala is the sequence in which the deities are invoked. When preparing the representational maṇḍala of coloured powders, or whatever other medium is employed, actual wooden or metal pegs are hammered into the ground in the positions of these deities. Generally speaking, the 'Bum nag (in common with both the VKMK and the Northern Treasures tradition) favours the sequence opening out from the centre to the periphery which is pegged down starting with Hūmkāra in the zenith and then moving clockwise around the horizontal from east to southeast and so on around to the northeast, finishing with Mahābala in the nadir. Our text is not perfectly consistent in this respect, however. In the āgama section at the end of the 'Bum nag, for example, the kīla of the four cardinal directions are invoked first, followed by those of the intermediate directions beginning with the southeast, and the sequence ends with the zenith and nadir. In our first chapter (Sanskrit sources), we see that later Indian ācārya such as Abhayākara Gupta also follow this latter system, except that they begin the circle of intermediate directions with the kīla of the northeast, and the tradition of the Kālacakra-tantra is different again.

It should be noted also that, despite the way in which the 'Bum nag enumerates the deities (listing Vajrakumāra and his consort as 50 and 51), the central nail is always the first to be placed in position.

Next are the five Supreme Sons comprising the blue Vajrakīla in the centre encircled by the white Buddhakīla in the east, the yellow Ratnakīla in the south, the red Padmakīla in the west, and the green Karmakīla in the north.

Finally, there are the four goddesses who guard the maṇḍala gateways.

Emanated from these 51 deities, it is said, are 2,601 gods. This number is simply 51², derived by taking each deity in turn to stand at the centre of his or her own maṇḍala of 51 deities.

The short tantra known as the Black Razor (BRT) takes this maṇḍala with the lord Vajrakīla at its centre and presents it as a peerless means for accomplishing 12 At one point in the present text also (translation p.209), Padmasambhava refers to this group as entirely female.

For the Northern Treasures tradition, see the BRT (below) and bibliography.

‘the unsurpassed bodhicitta of utterly stainless purity which cleanses the perceptions of saṃsāra.’ This is the point of view assumed by the authors of the Phur ’grel ’bum nag, and thus the Black Razor Tantra is included in its entirety here as our third chapter. The themes of this text are then thoroughly explored and explicated in the following pages which constitute the crux of the present volume, the Hundred Thousand Words Commentary of Padmasambhava, Vimalamitra and Śilamañju.

Arrangement of the Hundred Thousand Words

Beginning with an index or general overview of its contents (dkar chag, sūci), the Phur ’grel ’bum nag shows from the outset that it contains instructions concerning kila practice which operate on the levels of the three highest (inner) tantra: mahāyoga, anuyoga and atiyoga. Before explaining the details of ‘the six hidden precepts,’ ‘the ten steps of tantric engagement’ and ‘the twelve essential points’ that it lists, however, the text attempts to place itself within a historical context by presenting the reader with three scene-setting ‘introductions’ (gleng gzhi, nidāna).

In the first of these nidāna we are introduced to the guru Padmasambhava, who brought the teachings of Vajrakīla to Tibet. It has long been noticed that a special feature of the Kila doctrines is that they record a biography of the guru in which it is stated that he is born of a mother in the usual fashion, in contrast to almost all other Tibetan sources (specifically the many gter ma hagiographies) in which it is claimed that he appeared miraculously manifest in the heart of a lotus flower.¹³ Having given us brief narrations of both these traditions, this first nidāna ends with a short recital of the diverse lineages of his teachings transmitted through his various disciples. These registers take us several centuries beyond the eighth century origin of the text, which was probably kept up to date by interpolations of the early masters who received it. As time went by, however, it would not have been possible to keep a record of the proliferating numbers of recipients of these teachings and the custom of updating the text must have ceased. Of the two editions at my disposal, the later edition (B) by the modern siddha/scholar bDud-’joms rinpoche does, indeed, contain more information than the earlier text concerning the names of those involved in the lineal transmission, but I am unable to determine the chronology of the succession.

The second introduction presented in our text is ‘the nidāna that introduces the teacher’ where ‘the teacher’ is the deity Vajrakīla (Vajrakumāra) himself. As can be seen from the Black Razor Tantra, it is the normal practice for any tantra to be ‘taught’ by the lord in the maṇḍala centre to an audience consisting of his/her own emanated retinue. Thus, once again, our text attempts to place itself within a historical context by introducing the reader to the original teacher of the Vajrakila doctrines and this section describes the nature of the deity and the reason that he came into being.

13 See: A.M.Blondeau, ‘Analysis of the Biographies of Padmasambhava According to Tibetan Tradition: Classification of Sources’ in M.Aris & Aung San Suu Kyi (eds.), Tibetan Studies in Honour of Hugh Richardson, Warminster, 1979.

This section is in itself quite problematic for, it is said, the deity Vajrakila arose in order to destroy the demon Rudra, a historical cognate of the Śaivite supreme deity, who, himself, arose as a result of misapprehending the sacred Buddhist Dharma. The episode centres on teachings given by the master Thub-dka' gzhon-nu, the actual words of which are recorded in several Tibetan texts. The first of these texts to receive any attention from western scholars was the Padma thang yig shel brag ma, discovered as a gter ma by O-rgyan gling-pa (1329-1367), within which we read:

ཇི་བཞིན་ཉིད་དེ་མ་བཅོས་པར་མེད་པའི་
 དངོས་པོ་བཞི་ལ་གནས་སྤྱད་ཀྱང་མེད་པའི་
 བཅས་མཁའ་ལ་ཞི་སྤྱོད་བཞིན་ཏེ་མེད་པའི་
 འདི་ཞི་རྒྱལ་འབྱོར་དམ་པའི་ལམ་མེད་པའི་
 འདི་མ་རྟོགས་པར་ཁམས་གསུམ་ན་མེད་པའི་
 ལྷ་བའི་རིམ་པ་གཞན་མེད་དོ་མེད་པའི་

In the uncontrived nature of existence, in order that attachment to the four realities may be nothing more than a cloud in the sky, there is the road of holy application. If one does not know it, there is no other order of views in the three worlds. (English translation by K.Douglas & G.Bays after the French of Gustave-Charles Toussaint.)

The readings in the bKa' thang gser phreng, Sangs-rgyas gling-pa (1340-1396), and the Padma bka' thang are almost identical:

ཇི་བཞིན་ཉིད་དེ་མ་བཅོས་པས་མེད་པའི་
 དངོས་པོ་བཞི་ལ་གནས་སྤྱད་ཀྱང་མེད་པའི་
 བཅས་མཁའ་ལ་ཞི་སྤྱོད་དེངས་ཏེ་མེད་པའི་
 འདི་ཞི་རྒྱལ་འབྱོར་དམ་པའི་ལམ་མེད་པའི་

ཇི་བཞིན་དེ་ཉིད་མ་བཅོས་ན།
 དངོས་པོ་བཞི་ལ་སྤྱད་བྱས་གྱུར།
 བཅའ་མཁའ་ལ་ནི་སྤྲིན་བཞིན་ཏེ།
 འདི་ནི་རྣལ་འབྱོར་དམ་པའི་ལམ།

In the uncontrived actuality of the way things are, even though one acts in accordance with the four defeats, this has no more substance than clouds in the sky. This, itself, is the excellent path of yoga.

The problem lies in the fact that, again and again, our text warns practitioners of the vajrayāna not to make any error of judgement with regard to the sacred teachings, for it was because of just such a mistake that Rudra himself was originally created!

xxv

Following that, the text makes one final bid to place itself within a historical continuum by introducing us to the sacred scriptures (tantra) of Vajrakila. This it does by describing the origin of guhyanamantravajranaya, “the adamantine way of esoteric formulae,” explaining how this system of practice fits into the overall scheme of Buddhist teachings and, finally, by showing how the tantra of the deity Vajrakila in particular are accommodated within the larger corpus of tantra in general.

preface

The great importance of the literary tradition of tantric texts should not be underestimated when considering the Phur 'grel 'bum nag. Although the 'Bum nag itself belongs to an oral tradition, its subject matter does not. At several points throughout the body of this work, the three ācārya responsible for its compilation offer their comments on lines of text, the bulk of which are proved to be of Indian origin by their occurrence in the VKMK, ‘the fragment of the root tantra of Vajrakila’ which Padmasambhava himself brought from India. It is indeed a great pity that not one of these cited passages is presently known in any Indian language. Scattered liberally throughout the 'Bum nag, furthermore, are also to be found illustrative citations from numerous sacred scriptures of the Vajrakila canon, similarly unknown in India, the legendary genesis of which is discussed in this third nidāna.

The entire introductory section consisting of these three nidāna is seen to comprise a slight historical framework generously interwoven with an elaborate tapestry of legend and religious mythology. It is the only section of the text that appears to have been radically modified by later hands throughout the period of its transmission, but it is possible that even this modification may be limited to the listing of lineage holders. In the absence of any earlier text witnesses, it is impossible to say exactly what changes in the wording may not have occurred during the more than one thousand years of its existence, but the internal evidence of the text as we have it does indeed seem to indicate its great antiquity.

The philosophical and practical instructions that follow, in which the quintessential doctrines of Vajrakila are illuminated from many vantage points, begin with a series called 'the six bindings (chings)' or 'the six hidden precepts (khog don).' These six are divided into two groups. The first four explain the higher rites which lead to the attainment of unsurpassed awakening, which is Buddhahood itself, and the final two of the series deal with the lower rites which have as their goal the extirpation of enemies and obstructors. Further analysis of the teachings continues with explanations of 'the ten steps of tantric engagement' and 'the twelve essential points.'

When these topics have been dealt with in concise but comprehensive fashion, the text returns to focus on a selection of them in greater detail. It begins with what is arguably the most important topic of all, the four types of ritual kila and how they are to be employed. This topic was first introduced in our text as the third of the 'ten steps of tantric engagement' series, but here it is explained at length. The text then continues by revealing in full the evil mantra of the twelve protective goddesses who dwell at the periphery of the divine maṇḍala, the function of which is to awaken these wild spirits of nature, summon them as servants, and instigate them to go forth and drag hither the enemy to be slain. The mantra themselves cover almost five pages of text and are in an appallingly corrupt state. Composed of an admixture of Sanskrit, archaic Indian vernaculars (Prākṛit) and Tibetan, their present state of degeneration leaves us with very little hope of ever ascertaining the original formulae. It is, nevertheless, of great interest to note some of the ways in which these words and syllables are to be utilized as magical spells, for these are demonstrated clearly in our text. Thus, by the judicious substitution of a few simple key terms, the mantra can become specialized as 'body mantra,' 'speech mantra,' 'mind mantra,' and so on, and these are known as outer mantra. Then there are inner mantra, made up of the personal names of these wild spirits, and these are infiltrated with specific injunctions and powerfully commanding seed syllables. Used 'secretly,' these mantra are associated with arcane details of the cult to which they belong in a series of magical correspondences that will make no sense at all to an outsider. In this section, also, is explained the manner in which the ordered syllables of the mantra are to be recited in jumbled and reversed sequence for special effect.¹⁶ Equally obscure is the following section in which long and difficult mantra are associated with particular lines of the liturgy employed in the Vajrakila cult. All of these mantra teachings are stated in our text to be the personal instructions of guru Padmasambhava, here referred to as Padma rgyal-po (Padmarāja, the Lotus King).

The final section of the text supplements all that has been taught hitherto with a few miscellaneous details, in order to ensure the completeness of the teachings. The framework for this section is the division of the higher tantra into the three called mahāyoga-, anuyoga- and atīyoga-tantra, traditionally associated with the yogic practices of the generation stage (utpattikrama), the completion stage (niṣpannakrama) and the stage of great perfection (mahāsaṃdhi). Here, however, the key terms are tantra (root texts, traditionally associated with the teachings of mahāyoga), āgama (transmitted precepts, traditionally associated with the teachings of anuyoga), and upadeśa (oral instructions, traditionally associated with the teachings of atīyoga). Of these three, it is the transmitted precepts (āgama) of the Vajrakīla cycle that are dealt with here. The tally of these is variously stated in the 'Bum nag to be either 21 or 64 in number, and at this point it is said that there are 61 of them, but not one of these enumerations can be traced to a meaningful source. Thirteen individual lines are then cited from the root text rDo rje khros pa rtsa thung and these are taken as starting points for a series of short essays ('transmitted precepts') on a variety of topics not formerly mentioned or adequately dealt with.

16 For a further six methods of mantra application see: B.Bhattacharya, Sādhanaṃālā Vol.II, Introduction, p.lxxxvii.

Thus the three masters put forward their ideas.

xxvii

Subsequent spread of the doctrines

Following their rationalization in this manner, the doctrines of Vajrakīla are said to have been taught in Nepal by Śīlamañju and Śākyadevī. Śīlamañju is said to have taught a prostitute by the name of Śānti who, in her turn, transmitted the doctrines to Guṇapātala (a prince of Nepal) so that they then became widely known in that country, and Śākyadevī is said to have taught them to Dharmakośa by whom they were later propagated throughout Oḍḍiyāna.

Variouly introduced into Tibet by Padmasambhava, Vairocana and Vimalamitra, the Kīla doctrines have proved immensely popular in that country and a large number of instruction lineages continue to flourish among Tibetans right up to the present day.

Our text tells us that the teachings of the Phur 'grel 'bum nag were orally imparted by Padmasambhava to his yogic consort and disciple Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal, who stands at the heart of the reception of these doctrines in Tibet. Padmasambhava inevitably presented the report of this crucial seminar in his own terms and from his own point of view. From the remarks of the other two ācārya as we find them reported in this document, it is evident that the three masters were each quite different in character and each one would undoubtedly have presented the material in his own unique style. And we may presume that Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal would also have added her own thoughts on the matters raised in the text when explaining them to her lineal successor.¹⁷ The 'Bum nag itself is rather vague on the matter of its own authorship and lineage of transmission. It has no colophon to tell us who wrote it down, or when or where, but it seems likely that the scribe would have been ācārya gSal-le-ba (rGyal-ba byang-chub, known in our text as Ngam-'bre gsal-le). Since our text claims to be a faithful account of 'the teachings received by Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal,' it must be supposed that the transmission line from Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal to scribe was a short one and that subsequent modifications of the text were minimal. On p.125 of the translation, Padmasambhava says to Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal, "I have explained it all to you, and you should explain it to Ngam-'bre." And, indeed, according to the mTsho rgyal snyan brgyud phur pa'i brgyud 'debs,¹⁸ the recipient of these teachings was A-tsa-ra sa-le, and he passed them on to Padma las-'brel-rtsal.¹⁹ Since ācārya gSal-le-ba was the assistant translator of the Root Tantra of Vajra Wrath,²⁰ the scribe for much of mTsho-rgyal's dictation and the compiler of her biography, it seems more than probable that it was he who wrote down the 'Bum nag, perhaps the most important of mTsho-rgyal's transmissions. Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal died in 817 AD and we may suppose the text to have been set down in something like its present form by about this time. Certainly, from the language and style of the document as we now have it, we may believe the text to belong to this epoch. It is evidently a very early work and thus of enormous historical interest. Written in Tibet on the basis of material collected in India during the eighth century, much of which has since disappeared from the land of its origin, it stands as an invaluable testament to the way in which tantric doctrines were understood and practised at that time.

17 For example, in discussing the 'four masters of confession' (translation p.158): Of these four the kāpālīka brahmin alone is earlier than Padmasambhava and it may well be that the remaining three were added to the list by Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal.

Of the three ācārya, it is clear from all our sources that Padmasambhava is taken to have the highest status, with Vimalamitra second and Śīlamañju in third place. Certainly, Śīlamañju's explanations of the various topics reported in the Phur 'grel 'bum nag show him to be generally the most straightforward and literal of commentators. Using well-established systems of analysis, he teaches in simple terms such as 'ground, path and result' (sthāna, mārga, phala), the trikāya and the four rites. His exegesis of the Vajrakīla mantra (translation p.184) is less encoded with layers of mysticism than those of the other two ācārya, and he is, in general, the most prosaic of the three. The only unusual doctrine that he offers us in the present text (translation p.202) is a hitherto unnoticed division of wisdom into three types: self-arising wisdom (rang byung), wisdom arising from something else (gzhan byung), and wisdom which has become settled (gnas 'gyur). Certainly, from other sources, we are aware of rang byung ye shes indicating self-existing basic intelligence or natural wisdom. We have also encountered such terms as gnas lugs don gyi ye shes (gnas lugs ji lta ba mkhyen pa'i ye shes dang shes bya ji snyed pa gzigs pa'i ye shes), 'the ultimate wisdom of the natural state, 18 This brief document, written by Padma las-'brel-rtsal, is found in the rNying ma bka' ma rgyas pa THA [559] immediately following the 'Bum nag.

19 Dates uncertain. He is considered to be the reincarnation of princess Lha-lcam padma-gsal, daughter of Khri Srong-lde'u-btsan who died at the age of eight years.

20 gTing-skyes NGB 317, vol.27.

the wisdom that knows all that can be known, just as it is,' and which may be seen to relate to item three of Śilamañju's set, but the set of three wisdoms proposed by him I have not seen elsewhere.

Concerning the scribe ācārya gSal-le-ba: According to the mTsho rgyal rnam thar he was born in the village of *Hiraṇyapura (gSer-gling) in India and, as a child, was stolen from his parents by a wandering Hindu sādhu. He was then taken to Nepal and sold as a slave to a wealthy family in the Kathmandu valley, with whom he remained in service for seven years. Acting on the instructions of Padmasambhava, Ye-shes mtsho-rgyal herself travelled to Nepal in order to seek him out, for it was prophesied that ācārya gSal-le would make an ideal companion for her in the practice of yoga. In order to redeem him from his owners, however, mTsho-rgyal had to obtain a large amount of gold and this she succeeded in doing by restoring a corpse to life, a clear demonstration of her miraculous powers of siddhi (mṛtyuñjaya). The corpse was that of a youth called Nāga, the 23 year old son of a wealthy household in the valley, who had died of knife wounds sustained in a local feud. Remaining with mTsho-rgyal almost throughout the remainder of her life, ācārya gSal-le received all the teachings that were imparted to mTsho-rgyal and he practised them until the results were attained. In the colophon of the Kīla root tantra called Vajra Wrath, much cited in the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, it is written that he worked with Padmasambhava at dGe-gong (in the district of mChims-phu near bSam-yas) on the translation of that text. He also assisted mTsho-rgyal in her work of concealing Treasure Dharma for the benefit of future generations and, outliving her, he wrote down her biography after she died. It was before she died, however, that I suppose ācārya gSal-le-ba to have transcribed the Phur 'grel 'bum nag from mTsho-rgyal's dictation as a summation of received instruction concerning the vajra spike that nails down every impediment to human happiness.

Doctrinal themes in the 'bum nag

Reading the text of the the Phur 'grel 'bum nag we notice that the three ācārya who redacted these teachings have managed to saturate their presentation of kīla lore with references to all kinds of Buddhist doctrine. In this thoroughly tantric text, the pre-tantric path of purification that closes the door to further rebirth is said to be epitomized by the process of generation of the host of deities so that (translation p.180): "The deities of body, speech and mind purify egg birth (aṇḍaja), the wisdom deities purify miraculous birth (upapāduka), the deities of adornment arising from melted bodhicitta purify womb birth (jarāyuja), and the deities of armour purify birth from warmth and moisture (samsvedaja).” Thus the yogin engaged in the practice of these mystical doctrines quickly moves from the condition of stream-enterer (srota āpanna) to become, almost instantly, a once-returner (sakṛdāgāmin), non-returner (anāgāmin) or realized arhant. Following the ancient axiom that ‘all things arise from causes (hetu) and conditions (pratyaya),’ the deities each arise from a causal syllable HŪM when the condition for their arising is met in the form of muttered personal mantra. Thus, even this magical approach to instant soteriology conforms to the norms of established Buddhist philosophy and, although a ‘quick path’ is shown, nothing of importance is omitted on the way. The supreme deity himself, encapsulating in his nature both path and goal, is also found to comprise a large number of symbols demonstrating his total mastery of lower aspects of the path (pp.180-182).

Our text continues to demonstrate concern for the purity of the lower vehicles in tandem with concern for the purity of the higher. Thus, in listing the sins which are the subject of confession, our text states that there are four of these: The first is any undeclared personal impurity (pertinent to the layperson), and the second is any loss of the vows of monkhood (prātimokṣa). These two relate to the hīnayāna. The third is any degeneration in the arousal of bodhicitta (pāramitānaya), and the fourth is any downfall in the samaya of secret mantra (mantranaya), both of which relate to the mahāyāna. All of these must be confessed.

With regard to his retinue of ten wrathful kings, also, our text cites the Guhya-tantra to tell us:

Idle speech and falsehood, murder, wrong views and slander,
Taking what is not given, abusive words and a desire to harm,
Greed and sexual misconduct — these are the ten areas
Which the wrathful kings and queens arise to purify.

Together with the overthrow of the ten non-virtues, these great beings are further said to embody the ten supremacies of a bodhisattva (daśa bodhisattvānām vaśitāḥ), whilst their female consorts (‘mothers’) in this scheme are said to embody the ten perfections (daśa pāramitāḥ) (pp.189-190). Even the maṇḍala palace within which they all live is built up of such philosophical construction materials as the 37 bodhipākṣikadharmā and the rest, which are taken to be fundamental components of the palace structure. In common with general descriptions of the maṇḍala found elsewhere, the four gateways to the palace are said to be the four boundless minds or ‘stations of Brahmā,’ and thus the maṇḍala palace is described in our text as “the perfect representation of all the teachings of cause and effect” (p.176). That is to say, the religious/mystical nature of the maṇḍala is that its very form embodies the entire corpus of doctrines taught on the path of sūtra, whether they pertain to the greater vehicle (mahāyāna) or the lesser (hīnayāna). The way in which it functions, however, belongs exclusively to the path of tantra — the vehicle of the final result.

Tantric exegetical literature has a wide range of hermeneutical categories at its disposal, a number of which are to be found employed here in the Phur ’grel ’bum nag. Thus, the present text seeks to show that the teachings of Vajrakīla pertain to all classes of Buddhist doctrine, that is to say, to all categories of Buddha-word (buddhavacana), to each of the nine ways (navayāna) and most especially to each of the three highest classes of tantra. The teachings are then explained in terms of hitherto unknown categories of tantra such as ‘the six hidden precepts or bindings,’ ‘the ten steps of tantric engagement,’ ‘the twelvefold list of the essential points,’ and others. Within these larger categories are to be found the more familiar exegetical devices such as the simple fourfold division of teachings into outer, inner, secret, and most secret levels of interpretation.

Wisdom and means (prajñopāya) or emptiness and compassion (śūnyatā-karuṇā), key terms summarising the outlook and goal of the entire mahāyāna, remain fundamental within the teachings of tantra, but here they are taught with the addition of the tantric elements known as ‘union and slaughter’ (sbyor sgröl). Indeed, these four together are discussed at length in our text with regard to the four ‘material bases’ or ‘substances’ of which kila are made. According to the tenets of the Vajrakīla cult, the familiar kila seen held in the hand of so many icons, both human and divine, are merely those material kila employed in the lower rites of slaughter, by means of which enemies and obstructors are destroyed. Kila for the higher rites are of three types: wisdom, compassion, and bodhicitta, the last of these referring to the rite of union. As it says in the Guhyasamāja-tantra XVIII, 37cd: śūnyatākaruṇābhinnam bodhicittam iti smṛtam // The inseparable union of emptiness and compassion is called bodhicitta.

In our text (translation p.214), ‘union’ is defined as the sexual union of the male and female wrathful deities, and ‘slaughter’ is explained as the ‘liberation’ of the enemies and obstructors.

Just as wisdom and compassion are to be combined in harmony in the peaceful rites, where they are symbolized by the union of the male and female deities, so, here too, in the wrathful rites of Vajrakīla, the five fingers of the right hand are to be generated as the five males, and the five fingers on the left are to be generated as the five females. Then, in the inconceivable sky of the males appears a HŪM which transforms into a vajra with blazing tip. And one should imagine that the inconceivable sky of the females takes on the form of triangular iron mortars, arisen from the syllable E.

Concerning the use of the term ‘sky’ here: In the Amṛtakaṇikā (p.57) it is written, gaganam kamalakuliśasamyoge varaṭakākāśadeśaḥ, “‘Sky’ is the space in the centre of the union of vajra and lotus.” According to the Kṛṣṇayamāritantraṭikā (p.54), also, the obscure expression ‘mouth of the bird’ (khagamukha) refers to the entrance to the passage of the sky, and this is the birth canal (bhagamārga). Thus, the words ‘abiding in the centre of the mouth of the bird’ in that tantra means that the yogin places himself in the centre of his consort’s vagina.²¹ With such technical jargon understood, then, our text continues:

Dragging forth the enemies and obstructors, they are placed within those mortars and, as one recites, “They must be pounded by the blazing vajra pestles,” they are rebuked and pressed down by the vajra in one’s hand. Reciting 21 khagamukhāntaḥstham iti sādhyastriyonimadhyastham. Kṛṣṇayamāritantraṭikā p.117.

KHAṬAM/KATHAM,²² the enemies and obstructors are pounded to fine particles.

With regard to what is said here, Padmasambhava explains that the image of a mortar and pestle is used to illustrate the pounding of the enemies and obstructors within the triangular ritual pit ('brub khung, homakuṇḍa). In reality they are pounded in the mortar and pestle of the sphere of absolute truth (dharmadhātu), but during the rite of union, when wisdom (female) and means (male) are joined together like a mortar and pestle, they are pounded in the female sex organ. Vimalamitra said that, when the rite is performed outwardly, they are beaten with a vajra hammer. When the rite is performed inwardly, they are beaten with perfect mental wisdom. And when the rite is performed secretly, they are beaten with the vajra penis of the Lord. The secret vajra (=penis) is possessed of sharp flames of bodhicitta fire (=semen virile) and the symbolic vajra held in the hand is possessed of sharp flames of wisdom fire. These burn up the hearts of those who cause trouble. (Translation pp.215-216.)

And elsewhere it is said: “[The lord is referred to as] ‘Pounder’ (pramatha, also a kind of demon) because he has attained mastery over obstructing demons as a result of his having subjugated the hosts of enemies and obstructors such as ‘locality’ and ‘time’ by bringing the semen of great bliss under control.”²³ Thus the combined rite of union and slaughter brings about the blissful condition of Buddhahood on the basis of yogic self-control (ūrdhvaretas). Such instruction has been noted above in the exegesis of the Guhyasamāja-tantra and, in its introductory section detailing the biography of Padmasambhava, the Phur 'grel 'bum nag tells us that, as a result of his engagement in the fearful (rākṣasa) practice of union and slaughter — which it explains as slaying the masculine element and uniting with the feminine — Padmasambhava brought all the demonic forces and wild beasts under his command.

How are such teachings to be reconciled with traditional Buddhist precepts? Our text goes on to explain that, with regard to these rites of implantation, nailing with a kila is not performed without compassion as if one were using a vicious weapon. Instead, it says, having generated the kila as a deity possessing the essence of wisdom and compassion, the place of implantation is the moral defilements of all sentient beings. Striking at ignorance, the obscurations of karma and malice are purified and the result of this is liberation from the miseries of saṃsāra. Thus this technique possesses the essence of benefit for others which is the greatness of the mahāyāna. (Translation p.234.)

The bulk of what the 'Bum nag has to say, however, is presented as yogic instruction related to the four branches of ritual service and attainment of the deity (caturāṅgasevāsādhana). Generally speaking, ritual service (sevā) is one-pointed invocation of a visualized deity with the recitation of mantra. Subsidiary service (upasevā) in the Phur 'grel 'bum nag consists of further ritual service devoted to the oath-bound protectors of the Vajrakīla maṇḍala. Then, praying for the deity's blessings to descend, as one's body, speech and mind take on the forms of vajra syllables, accomplishment (sādhana) is the actual absorption of mystical powers from the buddhas of the ten directions into oneself as the deity, either in actuality, meditation or dreams. Finally, great accomplishment (mahāsādhana) is the ultimate realization of beginningless primordial purity experienced when body, speech and mind are fully identified with the deity. When all of this has been achieved, one may utilize 'the kīla of four materials that penetrate the extremes.'

22 Various spelled khaṭam, khaṭham, katham (khatam in the VKMK), the nearest equivalent to be found in Sanskrit lexicons is khaṭam which can be an axe, hatchet, chisel, a kind of blow, or the closed or doubled fist (as for striking). M.Monier-Williams, Sanskrit-English Dictionary. The Pāli-English Dictionary notes kata or kaṭa as derived from root kr and as having the meaning ‘ended, finished.’

23 mahāsukhaśukradāntavaśīkṛtaprādeśikakṣaṇādīvighnaganatvena vighnādhipatvāt pramathāḥ. Amṛtakaṇīkā p.91.

According to the detailed instructions of the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, ritual service has three divisions: the preliminary practices, the main practice, and the subsequent practices. The preliminary practices (purvāṅgama) are those preparatory activities such as establishing a place for retreat and the confession of sins, etc., by means of which the yogin purifies himself for meditation practice, and the main practice begins with the generation of wisdom, compassion, and an understanding of cause-and-effect in the mindstream, referred to as the three samādhi. This is followed by the generation of both the maṇḍala palace of residence and the deities who reside there. Subsequent practices consist of the invitation of the wisdom deities by means of muttered mantra, and presenting them with offerings.

For the ritual service of the deity, it is said that the yogin should gather together nourishing food, medicines to avert misfortune/disease, and the prescribed articles of worship and ritual service. Collecting together kīla of ritual service, equal in number to the 51 blood-drinking wisdom deities of the maṇḍala, he uses these for the ritual service. The chief kīla of haughty rapture is 18 digits in length and possessed of a wrathful face and makara (sea dragon, at its belly). The kīla of the ten wrathful kings should each be 12 digits tall and be made of material such as acacia wood. And so on.

The recitation of muttered mantra consists of three levels — outer, inner and secret — and each of these includes body muttering, speech muttering, mind muttering, virtuous qualities muttering, and enlightened activities muttering. Thus the yogin visualizes a white Buddhakīla on the crown of his head, radiating rays of dark maroon light in the form of kīla, like a downpour of fierce sun rays which obliterate all negative forces. In similar fashion he subsequently visualizes a red Padmakīla in his throat, a blue Vajrakīla in his heart, a yellow Ratnakīla in his navel, and a green Karmakīla in his genitals. Each of these Kīla radiates rays of light of the appropriate colour whilst the yogin mutters the corresponding mantra. The association of these five families (pañcakula) with the body, speech, mind, virtuous qualities and enlightened activities of the perfected state of Buddhahood is well-attested throughout the entire corpus of tantric literature and their application here is a simple matter of following the established formula. Indeed, much of what is written in the 'Bum nag is purely formulaic in character, and it is by such means that these ancient magical practices of village sorcerers have been so successfully brought within the orthodox fold of mainstream Buddhism.

With the completion of the outer recitation, there follows the inner recitation in which the rays of light, having pervaded the insides of whomsoever they strike, burn up the demons of disease. The secret recitation consists of directing the rays of light to diffuse the hollow channels (i.e. fill the nāḍī with light and remove all shadows), striking the heart at the junction of virtue and vice.

With regard to the length of the ritual service, the number of mantra recitations required to complete the service, and the signs of success, it is said in the tantra:

As for the number of mantra recitations,
 One should accumulate a total of ten million.
 As for the time, it should be at least one year.
 As for the signs, seeing the face of the deity
 One receives the prediction to full enlightenment.

Theoretically, the yogin should then engage himself in the subsidiary ritual service devoted to the oath-bound protectors of the Vajrakīla maṇḍala. Reading our text, however, we see that, in a number of cases, the ritual service of deity invocation quickly leads to accomplishment so that the necessity for upasevā is dispensed with. Ritual service, when looked at in detail, naturally enlarges to encompass many of the concerns proper to subsidiary service. And accomplishment, too, is often seen to become an end in itself in the 'Bum nag, so that teachings on the great accomplishment are not given. Interest in the activities of accomplishment (siddhi) may then become predominant.

Running parallel to these generation stage instructions, known as 'the method of the upper door' (i.e. the heart/mind), our text also speaks of 'the method of the lower door' (i.e. the sexual centre) in which the entire meditation is to be carried out in union with a partner. As it is said by Candrakīrti: vajrapadmasamāgamenāpi kilanavidhim āha, "It is just by the union of vajra and lotus that [the lord] speaks of the rite of nailing down."²⁴ These practices pertain to the fulfillment stage which is marked at first by the experience of heat, and then by the three known as bliss, clarity and the absence of discursive thought. These meditative experiences may easily be attained by a skilful and disciplined yogin who utilizes the natural excitement of lovemaking as an extra boost of energy by means of which he manipulates the winds (prāṇa) and drops of consciousness (bindu) within the subtle channels (nāḍī) of his body.

If one meditates with clarity, generation is achieved.
 If mental factors are under control, slaying is achieved.

24 Guhyasamājatantrapradīpoddyotanāṭikā, p.159.

If it is non-dual, union is achieved.

If the realization is resplendent, success is achieved.

According to the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, for rites of pacification the consort of the ritual service should be white in colour, small in stature and have a moon-like complexion. For rites of increase she should have a square face, like an ox, yellow in colour. For rites of overpowering control she should have a dark, ruddy complexion and a beautiful face, like a half moon. For the ferocious rites she should be of wrathful disposition with a triangular face and her eyes should look quickly all around her. At the time of the subsidiary ritual service, the man should generate himself as Vajrakumāra and his consort should arise as Diptacakra. Concerning the attainment, if the yogin is too full of desire the result will not be achieved but, engaging in the rite in a spontaneous and unpremeditated way, unsullied bliss will arise in the mindstream. As for the rite of great attainment, when the stage of heat is attained, there will be trembling and agitation and one will make a lot of noise. The signs will arise in due order and one will experience a feeling of bliss.

Following the general paradigm established in countless texts of Buddhist tantra, the Phur 'grel 'bum nag equates the three kāya of Buddhahood with the perfected state of body, speech and mind. In the nidāna that introduces the guru (translation pp.117-118), for example, Padmasambhava is said to have gained the three kāya after meeting with a ḍākinī who bestowed upon him the ripening empowerments of body, speech and mind. The picture presented in this interpolated passage is in total conformity with the pattern of other texts and, even in the main body of the Phur 'grel 'bum nag we are told that, "The body is the absence of self-nature within a manifest appearance of light which is the indivisible unity of clarity and emptiness. This is the seal of the nirmāṇakāya. The speech is the quiescent sound of the true teachings which is the indivisible unity of sound and emptiness. This is the seal of the sambhogakāya. The mind is great bliss which itself is the indivisible unity of awareness and emptiness. This is the seal of the dharmakāya." (p.312) This well-established set of correspondences is maintained in the discussion of the qualities of a vidyādhara (pp.192-193) and in the on-going exegesis of the three samādhi where the development of wisdom (mind), compassion (speech) and deliberate manifestation (body) are said to give rise to the three kāya. Our text also explains that the three kāya are symbolized by various aspects of the deity's form, mode of dress and the maṇḍala palace within which he dwells. All of this is perfectly standard in tantric texts of this type. What is most unusual in the present text, however, is the association of the three kāya with three types of Vajrakīla maṇḍala for, according to the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, the dharmakāya consists of oneself as the deity Vajrakīla abiding in the centre of the maṇḍala, the sambhogakāya comprises the retinue of ten wrathful kings and the nirmāṇakāya is the material kīla held in the hands. Thus, on p.156 of the translation, we read:

HŪM The fundamental maṇḍala of the primordial state is the dharmakāya,
 The circle of wrathful kings in the ten directions is the sambhogakāya and
 The Supreme Son Kila who embodies all vajra [deities] is the nirmāṇakāya.

What is particularly striking about this passage is its use of the term bdag nyid (ātman), here translated as ‘primordial state.’ Buddhism from its very inception has eschewed the concept of ātman or ‘self’ and it is this repudiation of self more than any other factor that has marked it out from the main body of Hinduism from which it arose. The doctrine of ‘no self’ (anātma, nirātma) is taught in the context of the four noble truths, the subject of the very first sermon, and constitutes a crucial aspect of almost all subsequent Buddhist philosophy. All compounded phenomena, it is consistently argued, are characterized by three qualities: they are impermanent (anitya), conducive to misery (duḥkha) and lacking any ‘self.’ In the literature of atiyoga or rdzogs chen, however, as pointed out by John Reynolds in his The Golden Letters (New York, 1996), the term is regularly employed with reference to the primordial state. In the Phur 'grel 'bum nag (translation p.140) we read:

This supreme teaching of Vajrakila
 Is the transformation of many states of mind:

Generated in accord with mahāyogatantra,
 One meditates upon him on the path of anuyoga
 As the illusory nature of the mind itself.
 He is finally perfected as the result of atiyoga,
 Quite effortlessly. Free of origination and cessation.

Indeed, the intensely introverted philosophical system of atiyoga thoroughly pervades the whole of mahāyogatantra and it is therefore no surprise at all to encounter an atiyoga technical term in our text. We should also remember that Buddhist mahāyoga developed in India alongside Śaivite kāpālīka cults and the two systems share many concepts. In the Pāsupata system that underpins much of this development, the term ātman is taken to mean ‘one who is powerful in Dharma’ (dharmabala), a usage that Buddhists of the time would have found sympathetic. Indeed, when divorced from the notion of individuality or ‘soul,’ the ‘permanent and unchanging self’ of Hindu philosophy easily merges with the Buddhist concept of dharmakāya. According to Prem Lata Sharma (in K. Vatsyayan, ed., Kalātattvakośa Vol.I, p.41), “Its primary meaning is the essence or real nature of everything, the principle of unity underlying all diversity, the undifferentiated principle behind all differentiation, the imperishable behind the perishables, the all-pervading, the formless behind all forms, the intangible behind all tangibles.” Described in these terms, the ‘self’ is seen to have qualities recognized by Buddhists as pertaining to dharmatā and thus the 'great self' (mahātman) or 'one who knows the self' (ātma-vid) may be used as epithets of the dharmakāya. The Lord is described as 'one who knows the self' in Mañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti X.13 and, commenting on this in his mahāṭīkā, Candragomin says that such knowledge is characteristic of the vajropamasamādhi. Raviśrijñāna, in his Amṛtakaṇikā-ṭippaṇi, explains that one is called a 'knower of the self' when [his understanding] has the nature of the sky by virtue of having gone beyond all mental thought processes.²⁵ Elsewhere in the same text (commenting on Mañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti VI.5) Raviśrijñāna defines the self as a mind free of mental events (acittacittam), the nature of which is not to rest upon any object (nirālamba-svabhāvam). Thus we see that this apparently non-Buddhist term does have a home in Buddhist tantric literature, although nowhere have I seen it elevated to such a prominent position as here in the Phur 'grel 'bum nag.

xxxvii

India and Tibet

An aspect of the Phur 'grel 'bum nag which may be of particular interest to historians and students of comparative religion is the way in which it stands right at the interface of the two ancient cultures of India and Tibet. The majority of Tibetan documents in which the teachings of India are recorded are simply straightforward translations into Tibetan of original Sanskrit texts. The 'Bum nag, however, stands almost alone among documents of the period in that it was originally composed in the Tibetan language for an audience of Tibetans, to whom it seeks to impart a knowledge and understanding of contemporary tantric praxis from the far side of the great Himalayan divide. Containing as it does, direct references to the Indian situation, such as mention of the four castes and so on, a system quite alien to Tibetan culture, our text rather self-consciously compensates for the foreign nature of much of its subject matter by repeated and specific references to the religious beliefs of Tibet. Thus there are tales relating the conversion or subjugation of many local shamanic landscape gods and spirits told in the introduction. That is to say, Indian kīla doctrines are introduced in this text as being instrumental in the conversion to Buddhism of local or native deities, and this leads to a reinterpretation of traditional religious beliefs. The list of deities converted and the actual circumstances of their conversion differ somewhat from text to text, for these are widely told tales to be found in the Padma bka' thang and the host of other hagiographies of guru Padmasambhava. Although these tales are everywhere recounted to the glory of the guru, they are mentioned here with the added bonus of glorifying the deity Vajrakīla for, it is said, it was mastery of the kīla rites alone that empowered the guru to perform such prodigious feats.

preface

25 sarvaprapañcātīkrāntatoena gaganarūpatvād ātmavit. Amṛtakaṇikā-ṭippaṇi, p.93.

Among those to be converted were the ging, a class of warrior-like assistants to the dharmapālas, variously described as dpa' bo (hero), las mkhan (functionary), pho nya (messenger), or simply as ging ka ra (from Skt: kin̄kāra, servant). On his journey into Tibet, Padmasambhava is reported to have been accosted by a demon called sGrol-ging who is stated in our text to be the military commander (dmag dpon) of the bdud, an indigenous type of demon later homologized with the Indian Māra. Nebesky-Wojkowitz notes a group known as the sgrol ging chen po brgyad, the great leaders of eight classes of ferocious ging.²⁶ These, he says, inhabit the eight directions of the compass and are described as having the colours appropriate to the directions, in accordance with standard tantric orthodoxy. Thus we see the process of their 'Indianization' or conversion to Buddhism complete.

Sha-za nag-po, another convert mentioned in the 'Bum nag, is described in the ritual texts of Mahākāla as having a bdud father and rākṣasa mother. There he is said to be as black as a raincloud with the ferocious head of a lion that roars like thunder. Dressed in a voluminous cloak of black silk with a bow-case and quiver suspended from a belt of jewels, he holds in his hands a lance and a skull cup containing bali offerings.²⁷

Gu-lang nag-po is described as the leader of the mu stegs pa, sometimes described as dark blue in colour and wielding a trident in his hand. Dressed in human skin, he rides upon a buffalo.²⁸ And Khu-le lag-dgu is variously described as the leader of either the 'gong po or the rgyal po demons. He is said to be yellow in colour and to brandish a sword. Riding upon either a bull or a vulture, he is the keeper of the northern gate of Pe-har's maṇḍala.²⁹ Then there is the character known in our text as (A:) Re-te mgong-gyag/(B:) Re-sde 'gong-yag, encountered by Nebesky-Wojkowitz with various spellings: Re-ti 'gong-yag, Re-ste mgo-yag, Re-ste 'gong-nyag, and said to be chief of all the bdud.³⁰ Our text (translation p.123) includes him in a rather formulaic manner among a group of four, the constitution of which is unknown. Included among another group of four, the constitution of which is presumed to be the four classes of treasure-guardians, is rDo-rje legs-pa, for this group is said to consist of the twelve brTan-ma goddesses, guardians of the white treasure of conch in the east, rDo-rje legs-pa, guardian of the yellow treasure of gold in the south, gNyan-chen thang-lha, guardian of the red treasure of copper in the west, and sTong-dpon dgra-lha-rgyal, guardian of the black treasure of iron in the north.³¹

The universal nature of the competitive sorcery through which these local deities became converted to Buddhism meant that the kila rites could be trans-

26 René de Nebesky-Wojkowitz, Oracles and Demons of Tibet, p.279.

27 Op. cit., p.65.

28 Op. cit., p.282.

29 Op. cit., pp.119 & 285.

30 Op. cit., p.274.

31 Op. cit., p.155.

ferred with only minor changes in their format to foreign soil, from one culture to another. The details of these rites, as presented in the Phur 'grel 'bum nag, are a shrewd amalgam of all relevant knowledge that had been accumulated up until the time of the text being set down in writing, circa 800 AD. Most of the details are undoubtedly of non-Buddhist Indian origin, skilfully adapted for the use of Buddhist yogins by the three vajrācārya who recast all that they could in the mould of the five family tantric Buddhist maṇḍala and reinterpreted the rest along the lines of well-established categories of tantric hermeneutics. But some of the details, also, are surely of Tibetan origin. For example, the recurrent theme of 'the five personal spirits' ('go ba'i lha lnga) who take up residence within the human body from the moment of its birth and who thereafter act as its guardian angels. According to the ancient Tibetan shamanic tradition, the home of the Mother Goddess is the left armpit where, mounted upon an ass with a white muzzle, she is imagined to hold a divination mirror and arrow. The God of the Life Force abides in the heart in the guise of a warrior, the God Who Protects One from Enemies has his seat upon the right shoulder, the Father God dwells in the right armpit and the God of one's Native Area sits upon the head. These Tibetan conceptions have been given a prominent place in the Indian story of the subjugation of Rudra in order to make the episode meaningful to Tibetans and, subsequently, they had to be woven into all the kila rites based upon this myth.

As for the many details of black magic to be found in the 'lower rites' section of our text, these could have been gathered from almost anywhere in the world, so universal do they appear, and this entire section reveals both Indian and Tibetan influences.

Indian influences include not only the formal Buddhist categories that give shape to the presentation but also specific citations from Buddhist texts. These citations include the isolated lines which are the subject matter of the commentary, as well as canonical verses which are cited in order to illustrate the commentary. Other, informal elements are derived from village cults of witchcraft, even those dealing with human sacrifice. As it is said in our text (p.227): "One tramples upon the head of the effigy, burns the upper portion of his body in fire, smashes up his limbs, and feeds his entrails to the mouths of the deities."

The formal trilogy of 'pressing down, burning and hurling' encountered in the 'Bum nag are simple expedients that might just as well have been imported from Haitian schools of voodoo in which the enemy in effigy is trampled underfoot, thrown into a fire and bombarded with noxious substances in an effort to cause him harm by remote control. The 'burning' section of this trilogy follows the general paradigm of developed Indian homa rites and thus possesses a number of specifically Buddhist features. The other two sections, however, have their roots deeply embedded in a primitive layer of the human psyche where geographical distinctions in human culture count for nothing. Even the names of many classes of the minor deities encountered in this section are common to both India and Tibet. When references are made to astrological time, also, although Indian systems of horology are not absent, our text shows a marked preference for the Sino-Tibetan system of the cycle of twelve animals. Wild fauna referred to in the text include beasts from both countries such as lions, tigers, musk deer, wild yaks and the rest.

Whilst such groups as the 'nine gods of existence' (srid pa'i lha dgu)³² and the rgyal po, btsan and the'u rang demons mentioned in the translation on p.278, are easily recognized as Tibetan originals, such unknowns as the blood frog remain a mystery. Residing in the centre of the human heart, this tiny creature seems to embody the soul or life principle and thus its subjugation is one of the goals of the black arts listed as 'lower rites' in our text. Although the idea of a 'blood frog' seems to resonate with the nāga-centred cosmology of those animist and shamanic peoples to be encountered in the hills and jungles to the south and east of Tibet, the route it may have taken to become incorporated in our text is a matter of pure conjecture. Similarly, the magical process designated 'revolving the wheel of the life force' (srog 'khor, see translation p.279) is a procedure that has long been popular on both sides of the Himalaya. Essentially it consists of a diagram of concentric circles, often with a hub, spokes and rim, within which are contained the mantra seed syllables embodying the vital force of the entity to be controlled. The Phur 'grel 'bum nag employs such devices to command the oath-bound protector spirits that dwell at the periphery of the sacred Vajrakila maṇḍala, and also to help gain control over the enemy to be destroyed. Typifying, as they do, the notion of power inherent in the written word, such devices are to be found all over the world and were undoubtedly popular with the sorcerers of both India and Tibet at the time of our text being collated and taught.

This volume closes with a few verses of prayer requesting the blessings of those who have mastered the profound system of Vajrakila praxis. It is extracted from the Ma rung bdud sde 'joms pa'i mtshon cha, a typical sādhana of Vajrakila by means of which all of the foregoing teachings may be gathered together and perfected in the mindstream of the dedicated yogin. Having diligently studied the copious points of the Hundred Thousand Words, it is to be hoped that more than a few readers will be inspired to take the teachings to heart and spend time in a closed deity retreat for the welfare of the world. The Hundred Thousand Words tells us of some of the many lineages of Kila practice that once flourished in Tibet, most of which are now available worldwide to yogins of the present-day since the collapse of Tibetan independence. May all those who strive attain the power of Vajrakila in combatting every obstructing difficulty that arises on the path of Dharma.

Vows. Triple seal.

32 See: Samten Karmay, "The Cult of Mountain Deities and its Political Significance" in The Arrow and the Spindle, pp.432-450.

xxxx

preface

Sources & Acknowledgements

The present translation is based upon two published recensions of the text:

(A) Phur pa 'bum nag and Phur pa'i 'grel chen bdud rtsi dri med pp. 1-229. Published by Gonpo Tseten, Gangtok, 1976. Within the following translation, the beginning of each page of this text is indicated by the numbers [1]-[229].

(B) rNying ma bka' ma rgyas pa, edited by bDud-'joms Rinpoche, Vol. THA pp. 215-557. This was published by Dubjung Lama, Kalimpong, 1982, and within the following translation the beginning of each page of this text is indicated by the numbers [215]-[557].

Throughout the present work, footnote references to these two texts are indicated by the letters A and B.

B is generally the better recension. A has numerous corruptions of spelling and grammar, not always noted in the present translation, but A evidently preserves some older readings not witnessed by B and these are noted with great interest.

A footnote reference VKMK indicates a citation from the Fragment of the Root Tantra (Vajrakilamūlakhaṇḍa: Peking bKa' 'gyur 78, sDe-dge bKa' 'gyur 439), the full text and English translation of which are to be found as the second chapter of this work. Reference BRT, followed by a chapter number, indicates a citation from the Black Razor Tantra (sPu gri nag po'i rgyud: from the cycle of Northern Treasures revealed by Rig-'dzin rgod-ldem in 1366), the full text and translation of which are included here as our third chapter. The reference Sādhana followed by a page number, indicates that the words cited are also to be found in the Byang gter phur pa'i 'phrin las rgyas pa dang chos srung bskang gso'i skor, an extensive ritual practice by 'Phrin-las bdud-'joms, published by Bla-ma Zla-ba & Sherab Gyaltzen, Gangtok, 1983. Most of these citations are also to be found in the Ma rung bdud sde 'joms pa'i mtshon cha, more usually known as the Byang gter phur pa dril sgrub, to be found in the Snga 'gyur byang gter chos skor las 'don cha'i skor, Vol.3 pp. 589-636, published by rDo-rje brag e-vam lcog-sgar Monastery in Simla, 1997, and also in the Phur pa dril sgrub, Smarntsis Shesrig Spendzod Series Vol.75, Leh, 1973, pp. 467-511. Indeed, these seminal words are also to be found in countless other sādhana focussing upon the deity Vajrakila, for the system taught in the Hundred Thousand Words Commentary is the very wellspring from which all subsequent lineages arose.

I am very grateful to all those who have given me such generous assistance in the realization of this project, especially my mentors C.R.Lama ('Khor-gdong gter-sprul 'Chi-med rig-'dzin) and Alak Zenkar rinpoche (Thub-bstan nyi-ma) who were kind enough to help me read some of the more difficult passages of the Tibetan text. I would also like to thank Dr Harunaga Isaacson and Richard Williamson, both of whom have my breathless admiration for their skilful expertise, and my friend Robert Beer for the use of his excellent artwork. May benefit spread everywhere.

Perhaps the most dangerous lightning appears as "bolts from the blue" -- lightning that begins upward, but then moves sideways and then downward to hit the ground as much as three miles from a thunderstorm. Share: FULL STORY. This results in either a direct ground strike or a bolt from the blue. An alternative way to discharge a middle negative charge is through a gigantic jet, which propagates upward. The height of the clouds somewhat controls whether a gigantic jet or bolt from the blue propagates. The higher the top of the cloud, the more likely a gigantic jet will appear. However, large positive charge in the upper levels of the storm causes blue jets. advertisement. "This is the first consistent definition of blue jets and gigantic jets," says Pasko. Lightning strikes to humans are uncommon but can cause devastating injuries. We analyzed lightning-related admissions to our emergency department from January 2000 to December 2010 to review and highlight the main features of lightning-related injuries. Methods. All data were collected prospectively and entered in the emergency department' database (Qualicare Switzerland) and retrospectively analyzed. or a bolt out of the blue. an event or piece of news that surprises you because it was completely unexpected. Mrs Thomas says the arrest had come 'like a bolt out of the blue'. Easy Learning Idioms Dictionary. Copyright © HarperCollins Publishers. Examples of 'a bolt from the blue' in a sentence. a bolt from the blue. These examples have been automatically selected and may contain sensitive content. Read more; It wasn't a feeling that said This is a bolt from the blue. David Cavanagh MUSIC FOR BOYS (2003). It wasn't a look that said This is a bolt from the blue, M